B. J. Rule resides in Florida with her husband, Gordon. She moved to Florida after a career as an administrative assistant in Massachusetts.

She has studied metaphysics for many years, including self-hypnosis, Eastern philosophy, and trans-personal psychology.

The cumulative result of these studies was the readiness to channel the discarnate spirit of her ancestor, Sir John Franklin, the Arctic explorer and his lovely wife, Lady Jane.

To validate the channeling, she spent six years researching out-of-print books and archives.

B. J. has written for magazines and newspapers and her second book Lisa Beth of Monaghan is published by Xlibris.com.

A television documentary featuring Sir John Franklin and his Arctic explorations will be featured on the History Channel.

B. J. is a member of the National League of American Pen Women.

The Book

Arctic explorer, Sir John Franklin, returns in spirit to tell his descendent, the author, his amazing story of faith and courage, fame and failure. Sir John rose from cabin boy to Captain of sailing ships in the British Navy

Sir John said, "Blood finds blood," as his spirit made contact with B. J. Rule to tell why the expedition failed, how and where he died. He wants to vindicate his name and tell his story to the world that his soul may finally rest in peace, The author's years of research reveals amazing confirmation of details told by Sir John in the channeling sessions.

Franklin navigated the ice-filled seas of the Arctic to search for the Northwest Passage. His last expedition sailed from England in 1845, and disappeared from the face of the Earth.

Expeditions from England, France and the United States searched the high latitudes for Franklin's men until 1859, when Captain Leopold McClintock found the skeletons and evidence of how they perished.

Lady Jane Franklin also comes through to B.J., telling of her undying love for Sir John. Their love transcends death, and as the explorers of the old crossed new frontiers, this book explores new pathways connecting to the afterlife.
